Hirshhorn Presents “Shirin Neshat: Facing History”

Major Exhibition of Artworks with the Artist’s Never-Before-Shown Studio Materials

“Shirin Neshat: Facing History,” a major exhibition of the work of the Iranian-born, New York-based video artist, photographer and filmmaker, runs May 18–Sept. 20 at the Smithsonian’s Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden. It is the first exhibition to place Neshat’s work in the context of the history of modern Iran, a significant influence in her work.

“This exhibition breaks new ground in illuminating the cultural and political influences that have informed her creative life,” said Melissa Chiu, the Hirshhorn’s director, who organized the exhibition with Melissa Ho, an associate curator at the museum. “Neshatimaginatively engages with contemporary realities, conveying deep conviction with a powerful and authentic voice.”

For the past two decades, Neshat has explored complex issues that exist at the intersection of gender and politics, particularly as reflected in the changing status of women in Iran. Although her work is informed by the social tensions of the late 20th and early 21st centuries, Neshat avoids polemical messages, instead framing political struggles as poetic allegories and personal narratives.

Her works are presented in an order that allows viewers to experience an unfolding of history through the artist’s eyes. The film “Munis” (2008) presents a magical realist vision of a young woman energized by the popular resistance against the 1953 coup that reinstalled the Shah. The fraught gender politics of the Islamic Republic is given allegorical form in an astonishing trio of video installations that launched her international reputation: “Turbulent” (1998), “Rapture” (1999) and “Fervor” (2000). The photo series “The Book of Kings” (2012) casts models as symbolic participants in the recent Green Revolution and Arab Spring.
Smaller galleries will provide background for the artworks with illuminated Safavid-period manuscript pages, wire-service photographs and newsreels, as well as production photos, never-before-exhibited studies and items from Neshat’s personal library that reveal her literary sources.

The exhibition will be accompanied by a full-color catalog that includes Chiu’s interview with the artist and essays by Ho, Iranian scholar Mahnaz Afkhami and poet and art critic Steven Henry Madoff.

Monday, May 18, at 6:30 p.m., Neshat speaks about her work in the latest installment of the ongoing Meet the Artist series. The artist’s first feature film, “Women without Men” (2009) screens Thursday, June 11, at 7 p.m. Other programs will be announced.
